

The Year of Revolution – the Conspiracy

It's amazing how when I am in the shower a tremendous amount of information that I consider pre-cognitive or from a higher source floods in. It started with my reflection on the sons of Prince Charles and Diana, how they really have nothing to rule any more, and how little freedom it appears that they have. They're kind of stuck where they are through their birth, locked into tradition, just keeping up appearances because that is the way it has been for hundreds and hundreds of years, and if that were changed people would probably flip out all over Europe and elsewhere, with massive chaos to follow.

Mankind, in general, definitely finds it difficult to change habits, practices, and beliefs. I recall a conversation I had with a leader in the coaching field. "There are only two times people change," he said, "either when the pain is no longer bearable, or the promise of pleasure and joy is so great." After thirty years of listening to other people and giving them advice, coaching them, I'd have to agree. Sometimes even though the pain is horrendous, some people cannot find the will power to change a simple belief, a little pattern that would take away the pain. They're attached to the pain, believing that they deserve it, that it is the way it is.

I've heard others refer to "lessons" – we're here on earth for "lessons." I don't think so. I think we are here for joy, but have no idea how to believe that joy is possible. Sometimes just changing our mind, coming at an idea from a different approach or direction can turn something that was sad into something profound and filled with joy. What has happened that so many people find it impossible to do that right now? Some people are so attached to their beliefs that they would rather die, or live in anguish, than change their mind. They just need to win, to be right.

That leads me to another thing I recalled. Someone told me something I found absolutely profound. He was a very brave, strong and kind Navy Seal, who eventually died in Afghanistan shortly after the September 11 terrorist attack in New York. I don't recall where he said he read it – it went like this: "There are two kinds of people. There is the competitor, who just has to win and competes with everyone. The competitor will compete with his/her mate, family, and even little children to win. Winning is all they care about, not people. The other type of person is the warrior. The warrior defends his loved ones and kills his enemies who attack those loved ones. I am not a competitor. "

On the surface of the world we see violence, terror, and war now. Economic things make it appear even darker, along with the intense weather conditions. I thought perhaps that when Spirit, that voice of God or Holy Spirit that directs my life, spoke to me of the year 2010 being the Year of Revolution it might mean massive terrorist acts, or Americans wanting to overthrow the present government and so forth. But knowing from past "channeling" that this wisdom that comes to me is always sensitive and well directed and orchestrated, I waited to hear more rather than analyzing and having my brain create "opinion"...something that I thought it was. I knew there would be more layers of information given to me in order to interpret that phrase "Year of Revolution." So I waited until more pictures and visions would flood in, and they did.

...On and below the surface of the world we see violence, terror, and war now. But at the same time, a revolution is taking place inside of people. They are willing to do what they must to find their way to light. Not all of them. It's mostly silent ones working quietly, creating what I heard referred to as a conspiracy - a spiritual conspiracy - that is forming and gaining more groups all over the globe, in nations where one might not suspect such a thing to take place.

You won't be able to find anything on these people when you search the internet or television and radio stations, or scan the print of newspapers or books. They're covert, concealed, under-cover. They're not recognizable by size, color, country or culture. Nor are they only in the city, on the farm in the mountains or valleys, villages, far off islands, or towns. You're walking past them all the time. None of them stand out, nor do they want to. They stay behind the scenes, just doing the work that feeds through their soul to their hearts and their minds. There is no religion that they have in common.

They recognize each other in the street, and maybe smile with a knowing sparkle to their eyes. You might even be one of them; and you know it. It's the spiritual conspiracy – there is no name for their leader. They recognize only the power of their minds and the capability of their hearts to fill and be filled with joy and love. I've heard it called a Spiritual Aptitude Organization. Mainly you can recognize the members by their random acts of kindness, giving freely of what they have, hugs, kind words, and smiles. Their creating a new world, a new universally understood language; they will overthrow the present governments.

I'm told these people are tenacious. It's impossible to stop them, even if you try. Each and every one of them is the change that they want to see in the world. They just continue to take action, silently spreading the movement. Maybe you'd like to join them - I hear they're recruiting all hours of the day and night.

Wishing you the best of everything,
